Šárka in the Eyes of Czech Composers, Attractive as Well as Ill-Favoured

Jiří Zahrádka

With the start of the Czech society’s efforts for emancipation in the second half of the 19th century a new field for the right dramaturgy and topics of Czech operas came into being, together with the birth of Czech national opera. Besides comic operas, e.g. operas with countryside themes, there appear motives from Czech history (rather idealized) and also, under the influence of German opera, motives from Czech mythology. One of the important motives which appealed to Czech composers was the story of the “females’ war”.

Stories about warlike women called Amazons were known even in antiquity and later on they emerged in the myths of some European nations. The Czech legend about the fight between women and men, i.e. about the so-called “females’ war”, is first portrayed in Cosmas’s chronicle. The Latin Chronicle of the Czechs was written in the second decade of the 12th century. A brief story of the “females’ war” is divided into three parts. The first depicts an Amazonian way of men’s behavior and women’s dressing, while the second describes how the women’s castle was built and explains its name, “Děvin”. The legend of the “females’ war” is thus a typical etymological one; the etymology of the castle Děvin—the women’s castle—is usual even in the Middle Ages (e.g. Magdeburg). Hence it is a medieval “mobile” motive of the women’s city. The third part of Cosmas’s storytelling portrays a game of young men and women not as a bloody struggle but as an ending with a conciliation and feast. Cosmas explicitly uses the expression “ludus”, i.e. a game. The legend presents a poetic picture of Slavic festivities in nature, most importantly the Pentecostal ones, when young men and women were involved in some ritual promiscuity.

However, in the later versed so-called chronicle of Dalimil from the beginning of the 14th century the legend is portrayed quite differently. Although Dalimil draws on Cosmas’s chronicle, the “females’ war” as an innocent game of females and males is here changed into a bloody fight and real war. Dalimil developed his interest in depicting fights, scuffles, weapons, and love stories such as that of Ctirad and Šárka. Unlike Cosmas Dalimil inserted a number of names into the legend: the Amazons Vlasta, Mlada, Svatava and above all Šárka. Mr. Karbusický maintains that the origin of the name Šárka can be seen in the etymological personification of the general expression “šárka” used for uneven fields, meadows and gulches since Šárka is to wait for Ctirad in a valley which Dalimil describes with the words “even today the spot is called Šárka”\(^1\). Dalimil’s fabulated story is closest to a mobile motive from the German epics mentioned in the Edda. However, it can hardly be determined where Dalimil came across the valkyrie epic poetry.

Subsequent versions by the chronicler Přibík Pulkava from Radenín from the second half of the 14\(^{th}\) century, by Aeneáš Sylvius Piccolimini (the later pope Pius II) from the 15\(^{th}\) century and by Racek Doubravský from Doubravka from the 16\(^{th}\) century drew on Dalimil’s version of the story. The version by the chronicler Václav Hájek from Libočany from the first half of the 16\(^{th}\) century also basically copies Dalimil’s story which is however slightly extended. In Hájek’s terms the “females’ war” took place as follows:

After the princess Libuše’s death her virgin maids led by Vlasta lost their respectability with men, and they even seemed to lose the virgin right to choose their husbands themselves, as was the habit when the princess was still alive. Libuše set an example as she chose Přemysl Oráč to be her husband. After an agreement with the women Vlasta let Přemysl know that he should marry her. It was obvious from Přemysl’s consent to marry her because he liked her that men wanted to take over the right to choose their wives in the future, which made the women and above all Vlasta furious, and so they declared a war on men. The women built the castle called Děvín opposite Vyšehrad, Přemysl’s seat, on the other bank of the Vltava and elected Vlasta their leader. They attracted many women and maids who abandoned their families. Vlasta gave them a sip of a magic drink which made them hate all men and they joyfully fought with a sword against them or tricked them. The brave combatant Ctirad became a target of one of the tricks. In the valley where Ctirad was to ride with his suite the women set a trap—the beautiful Amazon Šárka was handcuffed by the road and left there with a bottle of mead and a hunting horn. Ctirad, captivated by her lamentation came to release her and asked what happened to her. Šárka answered that she had gone hunting with her father, got lost and had been seized by Vlasta’s Amazons who wanted to take her to Děvín. But when they heard Ctirad’s suite coming, they scattered. Then Šárka offered Ctirad and his whole suite the mead, and when the men were drugged by the sweet drink Šárka asked Ctirad to sound her horn. That was the sign for the Amazons hidden in a forest who rushed in, captured poor Ctirad and murdered the rest of the surprised men. Ctirad was dragged off to Děvín and on the same day they dragged him to the Vltava bank opposite Vyšehrad, interweaved him into a wheel and broke his legs and arms. The men led by Přemysl finally decided to end the women’s fury and attacked Děvín. Vlasta fought bravely at the front but when she lost the battle and was killed, the other girls realized that many of them had already died on the battlefield and they wanted to surrender and return humbly to their husbands. However, the men were not merciful, killed them all, sacked Děvín and burnt it down. That was the end of the “females’ war”.

\(^1\) The oldest Czech versed so-called chronicle of Dalimil (Prague, 1958), p. 37. The original Czech is “i dnes tomu miestu Šárka dějú”. Since official translations of the quotations given here are not available, all translations are by the translator of this paper.
Václav Hájek from Libočany leaves out the final part about the infamous end of the traitor Šárka. According to Dalimil Šárka and her sister Darka were captured after the defeat by Ctirad’s son and both were buried alive. Šárka’s suicide does not appear in Czech chronicles at all and was made up by the artist Julius Zeyer—in his poem Ctirad Šárka petrifies voluntarily and in the libretto she stabs herself. In Anežka Schulzová’s libretto she jumps from a rock.

In the 18th and 19th centuries the “females’ war” became a popular theme of theatre plays such as Václav Thám’s Wlasta a Šárka neb Dívčí boj u Prahy [Wlasta and Šárka or the Females’ War near Prague] (1785–1799), and was also elaborated by literary means, e.g. Prokop Šedivý – České Amazonky aneb Dívčí boj v Čechách, pod správou rekyně Vlasty [The Czech Amazons’ or Females’ War in Bohemia Conducted by the Heroine Vlasta] (1792). The list of literary and dramatic stories about the legend is found in Hermenegild Jireček’s work Skazka o dívčí válce v Čechách z roku 1905 [The Story about the Females’ War from 1905]. In the Czech territories there are three librettos about the “females’ war” from the pen of Julius Zeyer, Karel Pippich and Anežka Schulzová. I would like to deal with the text by Julius Zeyer, which circulated the most among Czech composers.

Zeyer’s letter to Janáček dating 17 November 1887 discloses that the music drama Šárka was urged by Antonín Dvořák: “He asked me via Prof. Sládek to write him a libretto. I gladly fulfilled his wish.” When Dvořák asked Zeyer for the libretto is not clear; however, on 20 February 1878 a memo was published in Hudební a divadelní věstník [Music and Theatre Bulletin] stating that “Antonín Dvořák is writing a new opera Šárka”. This note would be the answer to the unclear assignation of the libretto of Šárka, were it not apparent that Šárka could not have been composed before the poem Ctirad from the turn of 1878 and 1879. Zeyer lifted whole passages word for word from the poem in his libretto. Šárka is evidently a reduced and altered version of the poem Ctirad and it is hardly believable that Ctirad originated in an extension of Šárka. Using this topic in a poem was also original. Zeyer describes the instigation in a letter to Jan Voborník: “Once I went for a walk with Vrchlický and we talked about Šárka. We concurred that we would both write Šárka, we would not talk about it any more, would not disclose anything about the conception and we would surprise each other with the completed work. So it happened. Vrchlický wrote Šárka and I wrote Ctirad […]” Zeyer was working on Ctirad from December 1878 until the beginning of January 1879 and straightaway in January the poem was published in the magazine Lumír. Zeyer is likely to have worked on Šárka after he finished Ctirad, i.e. after January 1879. The article in Music and Theatre Bulletin from 20 February 1878, which announced Dvořák’s composition of Šárka nearly a year before the completion of Ctirad, remains almost inexplicable. However, in the article it was J. O. V. (Veselý), librettist of Dvořák’s opera The Cunning Peasant, and not Zeyer, who was named the author of the libretto. What throws light on the creation of the libretto is a note from August 1880 in the magazine Dalibor that Dvořák would compose a new opera based on the libretto by Julius Zeyer and Josef Sládek. The same entry also appeared in a diary of the librettist Marie Červinková-Riegrová in January 1881. The libretto might then have originated sometime between January 1879 and August 1880. Nevertheless, Dvořák never started working on Šárka and not long after he had decided to compose the opera Dimitrij he returned the libretto to Zeyer. Bedřich Smetana, to whom Šárka was also offered, obviously refused it as well. We find evidence in a letter by Jaroslav Vrchlický to Josef Srb-Debrnov from 10 June 1882, when he was answering Debrnov’s request for composing a libretto for Smetana:

Dear Sir! In response to your respectable letter from 30 June I feel honored to answer that the libretto of “Vlasta” exists and the author is Dr. Pippich and the libretto of “Šárka” comes from the pen of Julius Zeyer. Just a modest note—if B. Smetana did not find either the libretto by Mr. Pippich, who is a music expert, or the one by Mr. Zeyer, who is a reputable poet, suitable, mine could hardly be pardoned in his eyes and I would not want to be in the same situation as Mr. Zeyer, whose libretto wandered from Annas to Caiaphas for two whole years without the famous composer writing a single response or word of appreciation for such ungrateful work. Do not think ill of me if I do not seem to be trusting in a similar situation and tell you honestly what is on my mind.4

Eliška Krásnohorská also wonders in a letter to Bedřich Smetana from 23 February 1882 why he did not choose any of the librettos. She sheds light in her memoirs on the reasons why Smetana did not want to set the libretto to music:

Once when he returned, he laid a parcel in front of me. “I pray you not to tell anyone I showed you this. They do not want you to know about it. They offer me librettos again, by two poets at a time and I would like you to read them.” When I unpacked the manuscripts, I rejoiced since they both contained Old Czech myths, both joined “Libuše” with their topics, both could help the master to fulfil his dearest music wishes. It was “Šárka” from the pen of Julius Zeyer and “Vlasta” – yes, actually Vlasta, written by another author. I read them on the same day and he soon came to pick them up and wanted my opinion too. Both were clearly praiseworthy and I recommended them to him whole-heartedly, for many reasons. However, he lost no time to counteract with his opposing reasons. He objected to Šárka almost nervously; he objected mainly because Libuše, the stunning, noble half-goddess, which he imagined in his “Libuše” as a vital and radiant ideal of a woman, is shown here as a “posthumous spook”, with which he never wants to spoil his graceful idea of our famous priestess-prophetess [...]5

Zeyer must have been somewhat frustrated by this and when he was addressed by the young composer Janáček, who furthermore had already composed an opera based on a heavily distorted text with a testimonial from Antonín Dvořák, he unsurprisingly and fiercely refused to grant permission. Interestingly enough, Dvořák started to take interest in the libretto again in February 1889, as proved by a letter by J. V. Sládek to Zeyer dated 15 April 1889:

I met Dvořák yesterday and we had a long chat. He pleads you to allow him to compose Šárka and not to give her to anyone else. He spoke frankly. When you gave him the text years ago, he was still immature! Now he feels strong enough, he is brave enough for something as big as this and he also understands it. He is totally fascinated, and once he starts working he will complete it soon since the text itself dictates the music. He depicted individual scenes and talked like I have never heard him talking before. He pleaded me to write to you immediately, which I am doing now [...]6

This seems inexplicable from Dvořák’s perspective. Instead of trying to change Zeyer’s viewpoint of Janáček’s request and help the already-composed opera of his friend to see the light of day, he assured the poet that he would compose Šárka himself. However, not even after this letter had been sent did Dvořák compose Šárka, and he never returned to it. Dvořák’s behavior remains inexplicable; however, Zeyer’s motives are clarified to a large extent by the recently-found correspondence of the editor of the magazine Dalibor J. V. Zelený with Julius Zeyer from November 1887:

Kindly read the attached letter, which I have just received, and advise me what to do. I am really sorry now that I have written and printed “Šárka”. I do not have the slightest idea who this Janáček is and thus I pray you tell me whether he is a man to be taken seriously. The text does not matter, it must be absolute drivel if it circulated among our composers and no one wanted it; and the texts used for their compositions surely seem to originate somewhere in Karlov. I am only afraid of becoming ridiculous when I get involved with Mr. Janáček. Il ne manque rien que cela à mon infortune. Bendl once told me that he would set “Šárka” to music; it has been a long time and I forgot about it as well as he did. I’ve just remembered it and I plead you to show him the letter by Mr. J. If he learnt anything about the situation, he could think I was looking for the gentleman [?]. He knows “Šárka” only from “Česká Thalie”, where it was published, (unfortunately!) I didn’t know at that time what this Č. Th. turned out to be.

I am sorry once more for bothering you and ask you for a swift reply so that I can answer the gentleman and end such an unpleasant affair. I believe that should he have asked first, I would have refused it and he could have saved his effort, my uneasy moments, and your reading of this letter.\(^7\)

Zelený’s reply came in no time. He sharply opposed his “anti-Smetana” adversary in a letter written right away the next day:

L. Janáček, known in music environs as a Brno opponent of Prague music and namely of Smetana’s modern trend, seems to be a man of ability and great diligence, but he is hot-headed for sure, although he is no longer a child but a grown-up man. Dvořák has seen his opera as well as Bendl, who, laughing, described how approximately 3 weeks ago Janáček, a sky-high anti-Wagnerian, composed an opera that was hyper-Wagnerian in some respects and whose parts were thus mostly impossible to sing. Besides, he also noted that his technique shows enormous weaknesses and his inventiveness is sometimes quite pretty but on the whole rather shabby. Bendl got hold of the outline only for a short while at Dvořák’s, whose judgment—unknown to me—is probably substantially more positive. Janáček is Dvořák’s unilateral propagator in Brno and Dvořák praised him highly as early as last year for very primitive choruses which Janáček donated him [3 male choruses, JW IV/19]. On the other hand, Bendl is of a diametrically opposite opinion! I would assume myself that your literary lost could not have been big if Janáček’s opera had not come into the world. Besides, I regard his behavior, i.e. the first outline of the whole opera—to say nothing of royalties—so disrespectful that any similar misuse of someone’s possession should not be supported. I favor younger composers for sure and I wish them poetic librettos first—but in my opinion this case calls for an exemplary intervention. However, NB—I had brisk disputes with J. [the dispute concerns Janáček’s article “Bedřich Smetana on Musical Forms” published on 15 November 1886 in Hudební listy]—I am perhaps not objective!—Let me also include a comment about your note on the libretto itself. You are right, our composers carried out a direct assassination of our senses; but Šárka cannot be set to music either by the non-dramatic Dvořák or Bendl, who, speaking in total confidence, lacks sincerity in his work and enough strength. I still do not know whether in the course of time Fibich could work on it [Fibich indeed composed the opera Šárka in 1896 but used a libretto by Anežka Schulzová]; he is already working on something with Hostinský (votre horreur – mon faible) [this is Fibich’s opera The Bride of Messina based on Hostinský’s libretto]. Šárka’s peculiar characteristics could only have been accommodated, of all our authors, by Smetana, if he had not been so restrained by Eliška; her action is very brief with its lapidary features. Do not take it as me reproaching a mistake. To make you believe in my sincerity I admit that I did not consider some trifle in the introductory verses worth your standard. A brief action is not a mistake for a great composer, who understands the full potential of lyrics and features strong broad stresses in his accent such as Wagner, for whom Šárka seems to be written, although Smetana could also have done justice to her musical needs. Thus I myself did not advise Bendl to take charge of Šárka—it would have been spoiled. I guess a poet like you is probably able to hold on with his work.

I hurried up with my answer to save you from thinking in vain about the unpleasant situation.8

The above-presented letter reveals not only a great deal about Zelený’s view of Janáček but it is also valuable evidence of what the Prague artistic and intellectual society thought about the young Moravian composer. Usurprisingly Zeyer decided not to fulfil his request, which is apparent in Zeyer’s answer to Zelený from 20 November 1887:

Thank you very much for your information on the bizarre Mr. Janáček. I call him bizarre to avoid labeling him with a different, less picturesque word. I refused his request in a considerate way and politely but I got a second letter, which seems to collide with my reply. It was frankly insolent. At least I thought so and I responded a little bit less considerately. Now I pity him; hopefully he is only as naïve as our dull “Dante – Šubert” in the poem in “Lumír”. What an ideal period we live in! Even a Merry Andrew pretends he is a poet.9

Even though it is apparent that Zelený’s negative report on Janáček was of fundamental importance for Zeyer’s decision, it could also be influenced by the poet’s injured vanity since his libretto was de facto refused by three prominent Czech composers: Bedřich Smetana, Antonín Dvořák and Karel Bendl. Janáček still worked on Šárka but it was not staged until 1925.

More than a quarter of a century earlier, in 1897, Zdeněk Fibich’s opera Šárka was performed for the first time. The story of Šárka and Ctirad as written by Anežka Schulzová is very different from Zeyer’s version since Šárka reveals her betrayal to Ctirad and he himself sounds her horn to call the women whom he wanted to fight with. Ctirad succumbs but Šárka saves him and declares him her fiancé. Ctirad is found guilty by the women and he is to be interwoven into the wheel. To save him Šárka resorts to a betrayal and asks the men for help. They liberate Ctirad at the last moment but Šárka being remorseful jumps from the rock. After the success of Fibich’s Šárka Antonín Dvořák began to take interest in Pippich’s libretto Vlasty skon [Vlasta’s Demise]. He reverted to the libretto in 1901 once more but as soon as he found out that the text was being adapted by Otakar Ostrčil he gave up on the idea of setting it to music. The first performance of Ostrčil’s opera Vlasta’s Demise was held in 1904.

Although Janáček’s Šárka had its premiere delayed until 1925, it is, thanks to its creation in 1887–8, the first Czech opera on the “females’ war”.
